But when Cuba shifted to free-market capitalism in the 1990s, privatization meant opening up its economy and its people to foreign investment and the private sector. Now, as Cuba moves to open up further to global trade, it is enacting an aggressive trade promotion campaign, becoming a new frontier for U.S. businesses. We asked a Cuban expert to tell us more. Eric Farnsworth, a principal at the Wilson Center's Harriman Institute, is a leading expert on Cuban politics, economics and trade. The following is adapted from a recent Harriman Institute report. The Free Trade Zone Cuba has more than 4,000 businesses licensed to operate in the country, a figure that is roughly consistent with the number of legitimate businesses registered for trade-related activities in the United States. In addition, there are tens of thousands of "cooperatives" that are nominally permitted to engage in some trade. Nonetheless, there is no real market system, no market economy. Cuba's real, functioning economy is a nationalized, closed economy. Cuba can make purchases from, and sell to, many countries outside the United States. But Cuba cannot conduct real foreign trade without using its state-owned, state-run companies to do so. State control of the Cuban economy, over the past several decades, has kept Cuba from becoming competitive. It has also precluded the country from attracting foreign investment, to the detriment of its development. Thus, an economy that is 80 percent state owned, and that is operated by the government's monopoly, is not a viable economic system. The Cuban government has talked about moving toward a more market-based economy. In fact, Cuba announced recently that it would move to a free-trade zone, something akin to the Mexican free-trade zone. The government issued a statement saying that it would approve "special trade zones" — for coffee, fish, sugar, rum, leather, shoes, textiles, tourism and auto-related products — as a first step toward opening the country to increased international
